Each Saturday, we will bring you another (or many) questions about alternatives to the use of coal, gas and other fossil fuels. What is the status of aerogel? It was discovered in the 1970s by Michael Heilman and colleagues, who made a lot of it, but not as much as they desired. Because of the uniqueness of their materials, they also named it "aerogel," since the parts were made mostly of air. Since then, aerogel has had its challenges. It does not have the strength of glass or a steel box or an aluminum pot. How many of us can use an aerogel dish? Moreover, it is expensive, and it only retains its material properties up to about 100C. (more...) For years, I took a lot of heat when advocating for alternatives to the fossil fuel dependency of food. My message was "do it yourself." I knew that I could not convince most folks to change without personal participation. And all too often, I was faced with people who felt incapable of doing it on their own or who simply did not understand that food production is not a "choice." In the modern, industrialized world, we must find a way to continue the evolution of human civilization without destroying the earth on which it is built. When we consider our future, and the plans of those living in the future, we will find there will be needs that
