Player movement is based on an agent on the pitch, which is the main focus of the in-game physics engine. It uses the agent's movements and actions to calculate his and her needs of possession, body weight, kicking force, and speed. We've seen success with our physics systems before, as seen in our football simulators FIFA Ultimate Team and The Journey and the basketball sims NBA 2K18 and NBA 2K19. The new in-game physics engine aims to closely replicate the action of real-life football, placing players in harder situations than ever before. Take the example of Real Madrid's Gareth Bale. We know he's a fantastic athlete and can kick the ball with incredible force, but when we move our free-kicks animation to the area around him, the physics engine doesn't assign that the player we are controlling is in the way. Instead, we are able to kick for goal, making Gareth Bale the greatest free-kick taker in the history of the sport. New Goalscoring Animation We are also bringing to life the new free-kick animation, giving players even more freedom when it comes to controlling and delivering a free-kick. One thing that was vital to the development of this feature, and the free-kick animation in general, was the exact trajectory and speed of the ball when kicked. We experimented with many different scenarios, including kicking the ball at different angles in different positions on the pitch. We also worked closely with the very talented community of streamers, Skylanders, The Mole, and soccergamers to capture actual free-kicks and create unique goalscoring animation sequences. This meant we were able to capture scenarios and animations that were never included in the game before. In FIFA, players have the ability to control the ball with one button. On free-kicks, we have an open-button that would, on a normal kick, just put the ball back in play - you still have to run to the ball first. In FIFA 22, we've improved free-kick controls to give players even more freedom to hit the ball harder. We have an advanced system that calculates the power and angle required to hit the ball, depending on the position of the run and type of movement, and then injects an accurate amount of force into the ball as the player shoots it. We also continue to research ways we can improve and expand the accuracy of our physics engine, making it even
